INTEREST OF AMICI CURIAE

The Cardinal Newman Society is a nonprofit religious organization whose mission is to promote and defend Catholic education. Among other things, the Society advocates and supports fidelity to the teaching of the Catholic Church across all levels and methods of Catholic education, and identifies and promotes clear standards of Catholic identity and best practices in Catholic education. In furtherance of this mission, the Society recognizes and networks Catholic schools and colleges that are committed to core Catholic beliefs and principles.

Christian Medical & Dental Associations ("CMDA") educates, encourages, and equips Christian healthcare professionals to glorify God in part by providing resources, networking opportunities, and a public voice for Christian healthcare professionals and students. It also operates CMDA Student Life, which is a network of campus chapters helping students live out the character of Christ on their campuses. CMDA has more than 300 campus ministries, representing 90 percent of the nation's medical and dental schools.

Amici's interest is in ensuring that faith-based student groups and educational institutions are treated equally to secular student groups and educational institutions.

They seek to ensure that government educational policies and actions are neutral and do not disfavor—or express an open hostility to—religious beliefs.[1]

INTRODUCTION

San Jose Unified School District's enforcement of its nondiscrimination policy violates the Free Speech and Free Exercise Clauses of the First Amendment because it is a content-based discrimination that is neither neutral nor generally applicable, and because it favors comparable secular activity over religious ones. The School District grants official recognition to secular student groups that limit membership to those who share their core beliefs, but refuses to recognize religious groups if they do the same. Indeed, religious groups are not even permitted to require their leaders to share the same, faith-based beliefs. The School District's policy also allows discretion to grant individualized exemptions, but it failed to grant such an exemption here. Such a policy triggers strict scrutiny, which the School District does not even attempt to satisfy.

[1] Pursuant to Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure 29(a)(4)(E), Amici state that no counsel for any party authored this brief in whole or in part; that no party or party's counsel contributed money that was intended to fund the preparation or submission of this brief; and that no person—other than Amici or their counsel—contributed money that was intended to fund the preparation or submission of this brief. The parties have consented to the filing of this brief. See Fed. R. App. P. 29(a)(2).

The lower court relied on Alpha Delta Chi-Delta Chapter v. Reed, 648 F.3d 790 (9th Cir. 2011), in holding that strict scrutiny did not apply to the School District's nondiscrimination policy. But Alpha Delta is no longer good law. The Supreme Court in recent appeals from this Court's decisions has rejected the Alpha Delta court's reasoning, and this Court should not follow it. See SEIU Loc. 121RN v. Los Robles Reg'l Med. Ctr., 976 F.3d 849, 861 (9th Cir. 2020) (declining to follow and abrogating circuit precedent because the "theory or reasoning underlying the prior circuit precedent" had been "undercut" by Supreme Court case law, making it "irreconcilable"); Close v. Sotheby's, Inc., 894 F.3d 1061, 1073 (9th Cir. 2018) ("A prior decision is effectively overruled if intervening higher authority has so 'undercut the theory or reasoning underlying the prior circuit precedent' as to make the precedent 'clearly irreconcilable' with the intervening authority.").

Alpha Delta's approach to the Free Speech Clause has been superseded by the Supreme Court's decision in Reed v. Town of Gilbert, Arizona, 576 U.S. 155 (2015). The Alpha Delta court declined to apply strict scrutiny because it determined that the nondiscrimination policy did not intend to suppress a particular viewpoint. See 648 F.3d at 801. But in Reed, the Supreme Court held that courts must first determine whether a policy is content neutral on its face before looking to the purpose behind the policy. See 576 U.S. at 165. "A law that is content based on its face is subject to strict scrutiny regardless of the government's benign motive, content-neutral justification, or lack of ‘animus toward the ideas contained’ in the regulated speech.” Id. (quoting Cincinnati v. Discovery Network, Inc., 507 U.S. 410, 429 (1993)).

Alpha Delta’s analysis under the Free Exercise Clause is similarly obsolete. This Court in Alpha Delta asked whether the nondiscrimination policy “target[ed] religious belief or conduct.” 648 F.3d at 804. But the Supreme Court has more recently held that government policies that treat “any comparable secular activity more favorably than religious exercise” are not “neutral and generally applicable” (Tandon v. Newsom, 141 S. Ct. 1294, 1296 (2021)), nor are those that provide the government with discretion to grant individualized exemptions (Fulton v. City of Philadelphia, 141 S. Ct. 1868, 1877 (2021)). Such policies are subject to strict scrutiny. See id. at 1881; Tandon, 141 S. Ct. at 1296.

The School District’s enforcement of its policy is unconstitutional under a straightforward application of recent, binding Supreme Court precedent. To the extent Alpha Delta holds otherwise, this Court should decline to follow it.

ARGUMENT

I. Alpha Delta’s Failure to Apply Strict Scrutiny under the Free Speech Clause Is Incompatible with the Supreme Court’s Decision in Reed

When analyzing the constitutionality of a policy under the First Amendment, courts must first examine whether the policy is content neutral on its face before looking to the policy’s purpose. Laws that are not content neutral trigger strict scrutiny, regardless of the policy's purpose. The court in Alpha Delta skipped the required facial analysis and declined to apply strict scrutiny, but recent Supreme Court decisions have rejected that approach.

Alpha Delta involved a First Amendment challenge to San Diego State University's ("SDSU") nondiscrimination policy. 648 F.3d at 795. The SDSU policy prohibited student groups from limiting their membership based on "race, religion, national origin, ethnicity, color, age, gender, marital status, citizenship, sexual orientation, or disability." Id. at 796. Student groups that violated SDSU's nondiscrimination policy were denied official recognition and its associated benefits, such as "university funding, use of San Diego State's name and logo, access to campus office space and meeting rooms, free publicity in school publications, and participation in various special university events." Id. at 795.

A Christian sorority (Alpha Delta Chi), a Christian fraternity, and various individual officers of each group challenged SDSU's nondiscrimination policy under the Free Speech and Free Exercise Clauses of the First Amendment. Id. Both groups were denied official recognition because they required members to espouse certain Christian beliefs. Id. at 796. In particular, the Christian groups argued that SDSU's policy was discriminatory on its face because it prohibited membership restrictions based on religious beliefs but allowed the same restrictions if they were based on secular beliefs. Id. at 800. For example, the policy permitted secular groups like the Immigrant Rights Coalition, San Diego Socialists, and Hispanic Business Student Association to restrict membership to students who shared the groups' core beliefs. Id. at 800–01. Accordingly, the nondiscrimination policy "allow[ed] these secular groups to discriminate on the basis of belief, while prohibiting Plaintiffs from doing so on the basis of their religious beliefs." Id. at 801.

The Alpha Delta court nonetheless declined to apply strict scrutiny to SDSU's nondiscrimination policy. The court found it "compelling" that the policy burdened student groups who wished to limit membership to those with shared religious beliefs, but the court still upheld the policy by looking to its purpose. Id. at 801. Because SDSU did not enact the nondiscrimination policy "for the purpose of suppressing Plaintiffs' viewpoint," the court held that the policy was viewpoint neutral and did not violate the First Amendment. Id. at 801, 803.

This is no longer good law. Since Alpha Delta, the Supreme Court has explicitly reversed this Court on this point, holding that government policies that are content-based restrictions on their face are subject to strict scrutiny regardless of "the government's justifications or purposes." Reed, 576 U.S. at 164–65.

Reed v. Town of Gilbert involved a sign code that treated outdoor signs providing directions to "religious, charitable, community service, education, or other similar non-profit" events less favorably than signs with political content. Id. at 160.

Over Judge Watford's dissent (see Reed v. Town of Gilbert, Ariz., 707 F.3d 1057, 1079 (9th Cir. 2013), rev'd and remanded, 576 U.S. 155 (2015)), this Court applied the same approach as it did in Alpha Delta and held that the sign code was content neutral because the government's "justifications for regulating temporary directional signs were 'unrelated to the content of the sign.'" 576 U.S. at 165. But the Supreme Court reversed, holding that "[a] law that is content based on its face is subject to strict scrutiny regardless of the government's benign motive, content-neutral justification, or lack of 'animus toward the ideas contained' in the regulated speech." Id. (emphasis added). Because the sign code, as written, applied different rules to outdoor signs based on the messages they conveyed (e.g., ideological messages vs. political or other non-profit messages), the Supreme Court ruled that it was a content-based restriction that triggered strict scrutiny. Id. at 171.

Reed makes clear that courts must consider "whether a law is content neutral on its face before turning to the law's justification or purpose." Id. at 166. "[B]enign motive, content-neutral justification, or lack of animus toward the ideas contained in the regulated speech" does not save a government policy that is "content based on its face." Id. at 165 (internal quotation marks omitted).

Alpha Delta skipped this "crucial first step in the content-neutrality analysis" (id.), ruling instead that facial discrimination was not enough to trigger strict scrutiny absent "evidence that [SDSU] implemented its nondiscrimination policy for the purpose of suppressing Plaintiffs' viewpoint, or indeed of restricting any sort of expression at all." 648 F.3d at 801. That is the same error that prompted the Supreme Court to reverse in Reed, and this Court should not repeat it here.

Indeed, in more recent cases, this Court has followed Reed's instruction. See, e.g., Victory Processing, LLC v. Fox, 937 F.3d 1218, 1226 (9th Cir. 2019); Boyer v. City of Simi Valley, 978 F.3d 618, 621–22 (9th Cir. 2020). And in doing so, this Court has joined other circuit courts in recognizing that Reed abrogates prior case law (including Alpha Delta) that looked to a policy's purpose when determining content neutrality. See, e.g., Cahaly v. Larosa, 796 F.3d 399, 405 (4th Cir. 2015) ("Our earlier cases held that, when conducting the content-neutrality inquiry, '[t]he government's purpose is the controlling consideration.' But Reed has made clear that, at the first step, the government's justification or purpose in enacting the law is irrelevant.") (quoting Clatterbuck v. City of Charlottesville, 708 F.3d 549, 555 (4th Cir. 2013)) (citations omitted); Pursuing Am.'s Greatness v. Fed. Election Comm'n, 831 F.3d 500, 509 (D.C. Cir. 2016) ("To the extent our decision in Republican National Committee looked to the purpose of a law that regulated content on its face, Reed forbids us from following Republican National Committee's course here. Because the plain terms of section 102.14 prohibit speech based on the message conveyed, the regulation is content based regardless of its purpose.").

II. Alpha Delta's Free Exercise Analysis Does Not Survive the Supreme Court's Recent Decisions Applying the Free Exercise Clause

Alpha Delta's analysis of SDSU's nondiscrimination policy also runs afoul of the Supreme Court's latest Free Exercise decisions.

In Alpha Delta, this Court declined to apply strict scrutiny under the Free Exercise Clause because it found that SDSU's nondiscrimination policy did not "target religious belief or conduct" or "impose special disabilities on Plaintiffs or other religious groups." 648 F.3d at 804. Relying on Employment Division v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872, 877 (1990), this Court reasoned that SDSU's nondiscrimination policy was "a rule of general application" and that "[a]ny burden on religion [was] incidental to the general application of the policy." Alpha Delta, 648 F.3d at 804.

Here again, the Alpha Delta court's approach has been expressly rejected by the Supreme Court's latest decisions, which this Court has described as marking a "seismic shift in Free Exercise law." Calvary Chapel Dayton Valley v. Sisolak, 982 F.3d 1228, 1232 (9th Cir. 2020). This Court should therefore not follow Alpha Delta for several reasons. See SEIU Loc. 121RN, 976 F.3d at 861; Close, 894 F.3d at 1073.

First, the way Alpha Delta analyzed whether the SDSU nondiscrimination policy was "generally applicable" was rejected by the Supreme Court in Tandon.

Tandon involved a First Amendment challenge to California's COVID restrictions for indoor and outdoor gatherings. At the time, California treated some secular activities, like "hair salons, retail stores, personal care services, movie theaters, private suites at sporting events and concerts, and indoor restaurants" more favorably than "at-home religious exercise," even though these secular activities posed a similar risk to the government's asserted interest, which was preventing the spread of COVID. 141 S. Ct. at 1297. This Court upheld the restrictions on the basis that these secular activities were not comparable to at-home religious exercise. Id. But the Supreme Court reversed, holding that the government cannot treat the secular activity more favorably than religious exercise. See id. at 1296.

SDSU's nondiscrimination policy in Alpha Delta would unquestionably be subject to strict scrutiny under Tandon. The policy "allow[ed] secular belief-based discrimination while prohibiting religious belief-based discrimination"—even though secular belief-based discrimination equally undermined the school's asserted interest of ensuring that the school's resources were "open to all interested students without regard to special protected classifications." Alpha Delta, 648 F.3d at 800–01.

The same is also true in this case. The School District does not dispute that it allows student groups to exclude leaders and members on any grounds that the School District officials deem nondiscriminatory based on their own "common sense." Even the Associated Student Body group at the School District's Pioneer High School, which is responsible for enforcing the School District's policies against all other clubs, requires officers and student leaders to have a certain threshold GPA and commit to be a "role model and positive example at all times for the student body," among other things. See ASB Candidate Application, https://tinyurl.com/5e6nxxfp; Leadership Application, https://tinyurl.com/2cs7vsm6; Incoming Freshman Leadership Application, https://tinyurl.com/289z7vjs; Class Officer Application, https://tinyurl.com/2p93zzta. Under Tandon, the School District may not allow these student groups to exclude students based on secular criteria and refuse to allow religious groups from doing the same based on their faith.

Second, Alpha Delta failed to consider the significance of SDSU's ability to grant exemptions to the nondiscrimination policy. Fulton held that where the government has the ability to grant exemptions to religious groups, its failure to do so triggers strict scrutiny. Id. at 1882.

In Fulton, the Supreme Court held that a policy that "invite[s] the government to consider the particular reasons" for "individualized exemptions" is not neutral or generally applicable. 141 S. Ct. at 1877. In particular, Fulton addressed a nondiscrimination provision in a contract between the City of Philadelphia and a Catholic foster care agency, which "incorporate[d] a system of individual exemptions" that was "made available ... at the 'sole discretion' of the Commissioner [of the Department of Human Services]." Id. at 1878. The Court held that this policy was not "generally applicable" because it "invite[d] the government to decide which reasons for not complying with the policy are worthy of solicitude ... at the Commissioner's 'sole discretion.'" Id. at 1879 (internal quotation marks omitted).

The City's discretion in Fulton allowed the City to stop referring children to a Catholic foster agency because of the agency's religious views on marriage. Id. at 1882. And the bare fact that the City had this unbridled discretion required strict scrutiny to apply. Id. at 1879.

Alpha Delta's contrary approach to individualized exemptions is, again, no longer good law. The Alpha Delta court acknowledged that there was evidence SDSU provided exemptions to its nondiscrimination policy, yet it still found that the policy on its face was a "rule of general application" and remanded the case only to determine whether it was applied in a discriminatory manner. See id. at 803. The Supreme Court rejected that standard in Fulton, holding that the question is whether the government, or SDSU in Alpha Delta, had discretion to grant exemptions at all—regardless of how it applied its discretion. Id. at 1879. And, contrary to Alpha Delta, even if a policy only "incidentally burden[s] religion," that does not save it from strict scrutiny. Id. at 1876. Under Fulton, the government policy must also be "neutral and generally applicable" in the first instance (see id. at 1876), which SDSU's nondiscrimination policy was not.

Third, Alpha Delta failed to consider that the government may not withhold a "generally available benefit" to student groups "solely because of their religious character." Carson v. Makin, 142 S. Ct. 1987 (2022) (citation omitted).

In upholding SDSU's nondiscrimination policy, the Alpha Delta court found it significant that SDSU had denied only certain benefits to non-recognized groups, while still allowing them to "use campus facilities for meetings, to set up tables and displays in public areas, and to distribute literature." Alpha Delta, 648 F.3d at 799. But "[t]he Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment protects against 'indirect coercion or penalties on the free exercise of religion, not just outright prohibitions,'" and the Supreme Court has "repeatedly held that a State violates the Free Exercise Clause when it excludes religious observers from otherwise available public benefits. Carson, 142 S. Ct. 1987.

Thus, although SDSU allowed Christian student groups to have access to some school resources, it still violated the Free Exercise Clause by denying them official recognition and its associated benefits due to the groups' religious nature. The Supreme Court in several recent decisions has held that the government violated the Free Exercise Clause by withholding a publicly available benefit solely because of the recipient's religious nature. See Trinity Lutheran Church of Columbia, Inc. v. Comer, 137 S. Ct. 2012, 2021 (2017); Espinoza v. Montana Dep't of Revenue, 140

S. Ct. 2246, 2255 (2020). To the extent Alpha Delta holds otherwise, it is no longer good law.

CONCLUSION

This Court should reverse the district court and grant the preliminary injunction.
